Online Behavior
Online Behavior

- How do people behave online?
- How does it compare to their offline behavior?
- To what extent can online presence substitute for personal meetings?
- To what extent do online interactions displace “better” options?
We all know what that means
Why does it exist?
Do emoticons have deeper implications?

Online Communications Aren’t Perfect

- Nuances obvious when meeting in person are lost in online discourse
- There’s no such thing as “tone of voice” in email
- Of course, the same can occur in books or newspapers, but most authors or copy editors are more skilled
- Emoticons are an extra channel that can help avoid ambiguity and confusion
Other Factors

- Anonymity or pseudonymity
- Physical distance
- Little or no chance of personal interaction — or retaliation
- All of these create mental separation
An Imperfect Channel

- Given the limitations of the medium, we should expect different behavior.
- The medium is different than the one we have habitually dealt with.
- Inherent? “We’re just funny monkeys”.
- Educated? Will “digital natives” do better?
Flaming

- People are very rude to others
- Rudeness exceeds the bounds that would be accepted face-to-face
- No apparent reason other than the medium
Godwin’s Law

“As an online discussion grows longer, the probability of a comparison involving Nazis or Hitler approaches one.”
Trolls

- Posts things hoping for a reaction
- “Trolling” for a reply
- “Do not feed the trolls”
Why?

- Immaturity?
- Boredom?
- Perceived immunity to retribution or punishment?
Ancient Phenomena

- Trolling and flaming go way back on Usenet
- Early Usenet misbehavior held in check by social pressure
- What happens when the community becomes too big and too scattered for that to work?
Harrassment and Bullying

• Targeted, malicious statements
• Generally done behind a screen of pseudonymity
• Sometimes random, sometimes aimed
• On at least one occasion, has resulted in suicide
The Megan Meier Case

- Lori Drew did not like what a teenager was allegedly saying about her daughter.
- Drew, her daughter, and a friend created a fake Myspace account. They pretended to befriend Megan to learn what she was really saying; later, they turned on her and taunted her.
- Megan hanged herself.
- Drew was convicted of a dubious charge; the judge threw out the conviction.
- (I’ve oversimplified)
Gender- and Minority-Targeted Harrassment?

• There is some evidence that women and minority group members are disproportionately targeted, e.g., the AutoAdmit case

• Has a crime been committed?

• What about anonymity? How is this balanced against the First Amendment?
Griefers and “Anonymous”

- Griefers: cyber vandals and cybersadists
- One loosely-organized group is known as “Anonymous”
- One action: uploading a flashing image to an Epilepsy Foundation forum, causing epileptic seizures
- (The FBI is investigating that one)
Gender Impersonation

• On the Internet, no one knows you’re a dog — and no one knows your real age or gender

• In various online forums, people deliberately adopt a different persona

• (Especially interesting in Second Life)
Accuracy and Facebook

- One study asserts that people are generally truthful on Facebook et al.
- Why?
- Because of the link to a real-world community?
Displacement

- Does Internet use displace other activities?
- Is there such a thing as “Internet addiction”?
- Does it displace other forms of interpersonal interaction?
- If so, is that good, bad, or neutral?
One Opinion

“Do we honestly think that communicating via Twitter, e-mail or texting is the same as hanging around the water cooler with colleagues or sitting and having dinner with a friend?

“I fear that in this age of technology, just being with another human in the moment and in real time is endangered. How can we think that machines can match the joy of personally hearing the sound of a friend’s voice or the gaze of a lover? I fear that we are losing the real meaning of human connection and intimacy, and I worry about the consequences.”

The Internet versus Phone Calls or Letters

- Is communicating over the Internet better or worse than older means of communication?
- Why is it worse than a letter? Is it worse than a letter?
- But — we’ve already spoken about imperfections in Internet communication
- Is it a way to keep one’s distance?
- Is it a deliberate way to maintain distance?
Staying in Touch

- Because Internet communication is so rapid and so cheap, it can be much better
- Letters or phone calls may not be an option
- What about video chats?
Breaking Up Over the Net

- Traditionally, done in person
- But “Dear John” letters are part of the culture
- Is email or a text message worse?
- What about just changing your Facebook status?
Getting Away

• When you break up with someone, do you unfriend them?
• Do your other friends unfriend them?
• Is it healthy to keep track of them?
• What is the line between that and cyberstalking?
But...

- It may be a way to stay in touch with your children
- Disentangling from an ex is hard even without Facebook
- Maybe sometimes distancing is good
The Challenge

- There are good and bad aspects to people’s online behavior
- Anonymity is important, but seems to contribute to misbehavior
- How do we — technically or socially — gain the benefits without paying the price?
